ENJOYING STAINED GLASS

The format for this study group has been jointly designed by Margaret Andrew and Jim McCready. They will both contribute to many of the sessions and also encourage members' individual contributions and general discussion within the group.

We understand that some U3A members have been deterred from joining previous study groups by anxiety about giving a talk to the group. In these sessions no member will be under any obligation to contribute in this way, but it is hoped that everyone will enjoy the experience of their individual study of stained glass and will join in the group discussions.

Jim and Meg write:

"To stand before a stained glass window is an almost mystical experience. Close up it reveals the secrets of its artists and craftsmen.

"There is beautiful stained glass at Knox College, and less than a mile away, at All Saints Church, there is an impressive collection of classic to modern stained glass. Stained glass can be found in situ in dozens of other churches and public buildings in Dunedin (visits will play an important part in our study).

"The study of stained glass is a hobby which is artistic and adventurous, academic and technical, can be active or passive...and the internet can bring much of the world of stained glass to your own computer.

"An important aim of the course is to encourage participants to contribute their personal experiences and discoveries."
